The child for Winnicott is not a body that eats and sleeps, but a living and breathing human being with an unconscious and imaginative life equal to that of the adult. "An infant is there already, actually living a life, building up memories, forming a personal pattern of behaviour" (p. 105). A sense of awe and wonder pervades Winnicott's essays.

Winnicott 's theory of A Good Enough Mother states that there is an instinctive need that must be met by the mother in order to ensure a healthy lifestyle. The theory focuses on the mother and her role responsibility to recognize and properly provide the infants needs throughout all their stages of life.

Bowlby and Winnicott 's Study of Child Development

The child will start to feel like their basic and truest needs and desires are not acceptable or manageable. In a case like this, the child will become what Winnicott calls compliant—that is, the child will adjust their behavior, without even thinking consciously about it. This conformity to their environment is the child 's attempt to protect themselves from further inadequacy or disappointment—but it is a covering up of the original, true desire.

Dr. D.W. Winnicott—The True & False Self—Depth...

Childhood Disintegrative Disorder. Donald Winnicott was a famous psychiatrist, psychoanalyst, and English pediatrician who developed an interesting approach to the human personality. Due to his training as a pediatrician, he focused his thoughts, reflections and theories on children. And, in particular, on the relationship between the mother and baby, and the consequences of this relationship.

What Is a "Good Enough Mother"? | Psychology Today

Winnicott considered Klein's envious baby to be the product of a failed holding enviroment (Adams, 1988). Conidering the child as more benign, victimized product of its enviroment (Greenberg, 1983). In contrast Winnicott, Klein considered the child's internal environment to predominate the child's interactions with the world.

Winnicott pointed out that no one demands that a toddler explain whether his Binky is a "real bear" or a creation of the child's own imagination, and went on to argue that it's very important that the child is allowed to experience the Binky as being in an undefined, "transitional" status between the child's imagination and the real world ...

Symington developed Winnicott's contrast between true and false self to cover the sources of personal action, contrasting an autonomous and a discordant source of action – the latter drawn from the internalisation of external influences and pressures. Thus for example parental dreams of self-glorification by way of their child's achievements can be internalised as an alien discordant source ...

The Parent-Child relationship according to Winnicott | by...

Winnicott built on Klein 's findings by deepening understanding of the relationship between the mother 's responsiveness and attunement to an infant, and the way the child comes to view themselves. Winnicott theorised that the child 's self-concept grew from their experience of their mother 's attitudes and feelings towards them.

Donald Winnicott Biography—GoodTherapy

The corollary is that it refers to a phase in which the infant depends on maternal care that is based on maternal empathy rather than on understanding of what is or could be verbally expressed. This is essentially a period of ego development, and integration is the main feature of such development.

41: The Theory of the Parent-Infant Relationship

Donald Winnicott (1896-1971) was an English paediatrician, who early on in his career became passionate about the then new field of psychoanalysis. He was analysed by James Strachey, who had translated Freud into English, and became Britain 's first medically-trained child psychoanalyst.

What Winnicott says is that the newborn baby at the breast is bonded to the mother—IF the mother is 'good enough' at nurturing—in a way that merges the baby and mother. The baby is not aware of any separation. Soon, however, by the 3rd to 4th month of life, the infant begins, just begins, to sense that the mother is separate.

Winnicott, Autism, and Play | The PLAY Project

Winnicott describes the holding environment as a developmental stage in which the child and mother are one entity, as yet undifferentiated in the infant 's consciousness. His writings on the subject emphasized empathy, imagination and love between the caregiver and infant.

Holding and Containing—Winnicott (1960)

Winnicott sees the micro-interactions between the mother and child as central to the development of the internal world. After the early stage of connection with the mother and illusions of omnipotence comes the stage of relative dependence (objective reality) where children realize their dependence and learn about loss.

The job of the good-enough mother is to guide the child through these stages, providing early connection and gradual release. Winnicott's stages are similar to Lacan 's three stages of the neonatal phase, the mirror phase and the symbolic register. A major difference is that Winnicott uses a softer, more gentle approach.
